

Good Homes In A Wicked World
by: Irven Lee

“The earthly home should be a simple foretaste of that heavenly home where the redeemed of all the ages will find rest, peace, joy, and happiness throughout all eternity.” (Page 167)

While not every line has book, chapter, and verse; Brother Lee writes with the Word at the forefront of his thoughts as he seeks to present a wholesome and holy alternative to what the world offers, particularly in regard to family issues.

Written about 45 years ago, it is not surprising that much of what is taught would now be considered old-fashioned and out-of-date. With that in mind I found it helpful, in rereading the book, to consider how the present might be if the past had heeded the admonitions found here.

I found the chapter “The Preacher’s Home” to be of special help. While I personally am with a group of saints who seem to have a keen understanding of the role of the preacher, not every preacher has that blessing. Some hold him to standards that are not always fair. This chapter deals with how a man will react to such settings. It is our role to lead people to the Lord. If my example hinders that then I need to make changes to my work, language, actions, and character.
